According to the Singapore papers of the 14th inst. official despatches have arrived from Pahang saying that everything is quiet at Pekan, and that assistance has been sent to Kuantan Tuncka Mahmond had arrived at Pekan. Des patches have been received from Mr. Rodger, o the date of the 10th inst., and at that time was, in the Semantan district. The Semantan district is rather a wide term, but it may be taken as meaning, perhaps, a hundred miles or more up the river from Pekan, and, perhaps, forty or fifty miles from the Sultan's residence. The Straits Times comments as follows on the improved situation:- " As was intended, the arrival of Sikh police at Kuula Pahang, fol owed by an English fleet, has frightened the robol Malays away from the coast; and it was not even necessary to land blue jockets. The Sikhs, now amounting to about eighty with the warships behind them, are ample for the creation of a feeling of security and, indeed, the sawmills at the Knala are at work again-the Chinese being well content with the knowledge that the Orang Putch means business. It seems difficult to understand why there should have been so, long a delay before engaging in a method of warfure that seems -o 10 1.00 effectual for certain purposes, and so very cheap.

ANOTHER STHAM-LAUNCH CASE.

Lan Shan, muster of the steam launch Pri dence belonging to the Steam Launch Company Limited, was charged with carrying passengers outside the waters of the colony in contravention of the provisions of her licence. Sergt, Niven said on the 13th inst. at the New Harbour wharf, when she was run into 7.30 a.m. he saw the Prudence coming down the fairway from east to west. He stopmed ber and boarded her and asked for her licence. He was told that it was at the Harbour Master's. The Prudence then proceeded on her way and went in the direction of Capsimoon. From her register witness found that she was licensed to carry 81 passengers within the waters of the colony. She was not licensed to carry passengers outside the waters of the colony, Chinese wiliness as follows: -In delimiting the Witness watched the launch until she was nearly the Canton River.

Mr. J. V. P. de Jesus, Secretary of the Steam Launch Company, said that he applied for an outside licence some weeks ago and was told that he could not get it until the boat was provided with proper boats and life buoys. They then had to take out a licence for within the waters of the colony. Application was made for this and witness was told then that he could not get a licence for outside the waters of the colony because the requirements of the Ordinance had not been fulfilled His Worship-You were running without a

Mr. de Jesus-I had only a letter from Mr. Dickson imying he had completed his survey of the launch and I was under the impression could run her under it until I got a licence. Jeseph Alves, second clerk, Harbour Office, stated-It is one of my duties to issue launch licences. The former licence of the Pradence expired on 9th March last. Application was made at this Office for a new licence on 25th March The new licence was issued on the 20th inst. His Worship-What happened between 9th March and 20th April? How was it there was a delay in issuing the licence?—I believe she was under repairs, but I do not know. But after the application for a licence passed through your hands where did it go to ?—1 sent it down to Mr. Diokson for the survey. It came back to me after the survey was out. Is there any note of that, when it came back to you ?-The survey paper is duced 9th April. That leaves still eleven days ?-We had to sign bonds and Mr. Jesus did not come here. The band was signed on the 16th inst. For what licence was there application?-For lying within the waters of the Colony only. Do you know of any other application ?-Mr Jesus told me he mad, application to Mr lickson. A new licence was granted for plying within the waters of the Colony only. He wanted me to wait a few days till be got unother survey and he came back and said Mr. Dickson would

Does that account for the four days' delay in grunting the licence P-Yes. When were you told she could not have an utside licence?—It was on the 19th inst. Robert Dickson, acting Government Marine Surveyor, said he remembered the Prudence coming under his survey. His declaration was sont to the Launch Company on the 9th inst for an inside licence only. The launch was ut that time under repair. On the 16th Mr. de Jesus applied to him for an out licence. Witness told him a day or two afterwards that certain provisions for saving life had to be made be fore a licence could be granted. Thereupon he withdrew the application for an outside licence On the day survey was completed he (witness' sent a letter of clearance and a declaration. letter of clearance was issued pending the issue of a certificate, as the Company wanted to carry passengers immediately. After some further questions had been put, His Worship said-It appears that the original application was for an inside licence and for this the launch was surveyed and passed. When passed, to save the inconvenience of delay to the owners, the Government Marino Surveyor gave a written certificate to the effect that the launch was fit to run, and that the licence would issue in due course. But the owner appears to have wanted to run outside the waters, and he did so on the strength of the "Certificate of Convenience," merely mentioning to the Surreyor that he was going to apply for an outside licence. This was an abuse of the certificate, and if the Government Surveyor had told him that he could not have an outside licence without the addition of a boat and two life-buoys at the time of his mentioning that it was his intention to apply for an outside licence I should have convicted defendant, who it appears was acting no der the order of the Comments, important facts were brought out by Sir pany. ## CHAPTER I:

CANTLES IN THE AIR. There were evident signs of expectation both in the parlour at the back of the shop and in the movements of the lady, if the term now so indiscriminately used may be allowed regarding l the fine-looking woman who restlessly alternated between the parlour and the drawing-room on the floor above, where the window commanded n good view of the high road. A woman really over forty, she looked by the light of the gas, and, while flushed with excitement, scarcely thirty. Handsome shoundoubtedly was. Figure, features, and complexion forbade any other judgment, but a refined taste would have found each and all too pronounced. There was a want of repose in her manners, and the tone of her voice was peculiar—loud and utterly wanting in intonation, while her speech was apparently not on friendly terms with any known grammarian.

These defects would inevitably have caused an observer to set her at her true level—that of a well-to-do tradesman's wife, wanting in refinement and in education, but possibly by no means: deficient in worldly tact, business qualities, and general amiability.

It was past six, and Mrs. Horion had expected that her daughters would have arrived quite an hour before. What could have delayed them? Bessie, the housemaid, had gone to meet them at a station a few miles distant; and she, as her mistress knew, was as competent and belpful in travelling as her daughters' inexperience could

The parlour was gay with flowers, and the tea table looked inviting, loaded with the many dainties which in the northern counties may be considered suitable to do honour to a "high ten:" and to partake of which generous repast, "We must keep her in black, Harry, mind the urn seemed, in its bissing and boiling state, that." offering an impatient welcome.

nervous, a condition most nausual with her, and therefore the more apparent. Often as she had altered the arrangements of the table, the position of the flowers and of the few books and ornamental articles about the rooms, she yet found cause for re-adjustment.

Now it was the fire that was thought too large, so she carefully took off some of the coals she had put on only a few moments before. Then the lamp would perhaps look prettier on the sideboard, since the table was lighted by the overhanging gas, which she had turned very low, but now considered would, after all, look more cheerful if put up higher.

Equally doubtful of herself, or rather, doubtful if she had made the most of herself, she several times stopped to look at and examine her appearance by the large mantel glass. She need not have been doubtful. Betty Horton was looking her best. The deep mourning she were for the less of her husband toned down the superabundance of her style, and gave an appearance of dignity details. which was desirable.

The richness of the widow's weeds, and the good, though showy furniture, materally suggested that her departed husband had left her ample means, which was indeed the case. Silas Horton had, during his 60 years' lease of life, worked hard, first as an apprentice, then as an assistant, and finally as master on his own face, though far less regular, and less strictly studied till all the mysteries of the drapery line of business were at his fingers' ends, and he was tolerably prosperous. At the age of forty, a widower with one child. he found himself in a position to marry again, and was desirous of doing so. Betty Ashton, the handsome daughter of neighbouring butcher, was at that period the admiration of all the young fellows in and around Wakeley, and had long owned a soft place in the heart of the widowed Silas.

At last the draper, either encouraged by her kindness, or, as he thought himself to be at the time, dazed and foolhardy, determined to comnete with the younger and more eligible suitors and made her an offer, alike remarkable for its awkwardness and intensity.

To his amazement he was accepted: and allowed shortly after to bring her, a loving and happy bride-and well dewered, to share with him the foils of his business, and the comforts of

And for twenty years, long in toil, but short in the enjoyment of their unruffled love ba Silas and Betty worked side by side. Each year had added to their prosperity. Children had been born to them, though one only survived besides the daughter by his first wife. These two girls had been educated together.

A childish delicacy, long since outgrown, had kept Harriet's education decidedly backward; in before, and 'elp as my steward"—bringing out fact the girls at the respective ages of nine and the word with evident reliah—"and sure we were expected home, and were finally leaving their fashionable boarding-school, Jessie was the more accomplished. about their own future. The hands of the clock pointed to seven, and still the girls had not arrived. Their mother was getting really slarmed; and went again to the drawing-room window. A cab was at the moment turning the corner of the High-street. She watched till it had stopped at her own door. and in another minute her daughters were in her warm embrace. pays the cabby and sees to the luggage. I precious lot you've got too!" The children, who were in truth two finely grown, fashionably dressed young women, obeyed her directions, and she soon joined them. "Mother! how jolly it all looks, how cosy and how good the tea smells," said Harrist, wit a glance at the home-cured ham, the Yorkshire cake, home-made bread, and moffins, which the cook was then placing on the table.

"I am just famished," Jessie said, taking off her little crape hat, and adjusting her curls at

'-No, mother, we won't go upstairs, we are dead beat," they both declared, as they filled her arms with their wrappings, jackets, and hats. "All right, they shall stop down 'ere till I takes 'em up. Horton seated herself at the tea tray. "Isn't she younger than ever. Jessie F" "And handsomer than ever. I can't think what's come to you, mother," responded Jessie "You look so much _much grander," she added, with a slight hesitation, not liking to express . her thought, which was that their mother looked more lady-like. Deeply gratified by their praise, she made them sit down while she waited fassily upon them, and for a while the conversation was carried on chiefly by her; for the girls were, an they said, hungry, and enjoyed to the full the good things that had been so wanting in their school diet. "Lor! if th' muffins aint cold," she exclaimed. suddenly. " Put them in toven a bit, Bessie," as the servant answered the bell. "Mother," Harriet began, "I'll tell you why we were so late, we missed our train, and all

"Why does he do it?" questioned Jessie. "Goodness only knows," replied her mother. In a hurry to be rich, I suppose, though I him comfortably, and he sin't a marrying man. Robert Randal, the object of these questions, was a man about thirty-five years of age, who business manager, as long as the girls could re-

The girls, at their mother's request, went into he drawing-room while the tea table was eleared When they were alone, Harriet began : " I say, less, one of our great difficulties is removed. Isn't mother much improved in appearance F' "I should think so, indeed. I never saw such! a change. It's wearing black; how well it suits

Betty Horton was not only expectant—she was think she must have felt father's loss awfully ?" Yes, and she's paler than she was. Don't you "I fear so," Jessie answered, with feeling, "but it's just like her ; lets as know nothing, or see nothing; and bears it all alone."

"She has been the best wife, and is the best mother that ever lived." Harrist responded. "Yet she needs touching up. Her talk grates on me more each time I come home," said Jessie. "We must remedy that, somehow. Get her to think it better form to speak seldom. But I believe if we put it frankly before her, she would wish us to tell her every time she speaks incorrectly, rather than resent it. Here she comes!

and Harriet jumped up from the couch on which she had thrown herself Together the three went back to the parlour. for the fire was pleasant in the chilly autumn evenings-and sitting round it, their mother told them about their father's illness and death.

Harrist's, though a good face, ith regular features surrounded by massive coils of golden hair, was of a heavier type than Jessie's, whose beautiful, was so ammated, and had such contional play of expression that she would often attract an observer more than her sister. Jessie's hair was short, and curled naturally all over per small, well-shaped head, falling in little waves When their mother had recovered her composure, she suddenly said-"I say, gals, we're left uncommon well off, we could keep our carriage if we chose."

The girls eyes met with a quick gleam of satisfaction. "Do you mean without going on with the business ? " Harriet asked. "That I do: the business is done with. I've sold it. I've messed long enough in that line. Now we'll play at being ladies: anyhow, we'll dress, and est, and drink as the best of them " Need we always live here then, ma?" Jessio asked, looking at Harriet, as if to give her a timely hint for co-operation. "We can live just where we pleases, only ain't this 'ouse good enough P",

" Not if we can afford a better, and go away from these people, who all know us as drapers," Jossie remarked, sharply. "How much money have we, mother? And is there some left to I must say what I have to say briefly." "Bless your little 'arts, no, no; it's all left to common. The elder, Harrist, was twenty years knew as how he could trust me. Let's take a house in town, mother, and keep a carriage, like so many of the girls' parents at our school do. We might then ask thom to visit us, as we have often been invited by them "So you shall then; my gals shan't be behind anyone else's; and these yer friends shall come au' see you Mind, with all our money I shall expect both o' yer to catch rich 'usbands." "Isn't a really good man worth consideration

even if not rich?" said Harriet, thoughtfully, looking into the fire. "Not when you can get the two together," said the mother with sudden, all stern decision. "Bother rich husbands?" replied the flippant old happy time." Jessie, "if we have the money, and went only caste, it strikes me it's caste we ve got to sim at. " I ain't so quick at catching your mesning. Jess. If you bother rich husbands, what do

I don't know," Jessie answered pettish " only when other girls, without money, and almost plain, marry men with titles. I don't see why we shouldn't look as high. People say money does everything. They would go to the sea-side for in London. Then the girls should come out opportunity to sneak with Mrs. Horton the well-known brands of and share in the festivities of the season. At last she tucked them up, and gave her final kiss, leaving them to dream of coming triumphs. For herself, there was one thought perpetually in her brain, the thought which Jessie's words had given birth to. Slowly and with difficulty her mind had grasped it, and risen to the height that seemed so alluring. She was now determined to hold to it firmly; and from that moment the idea worked like a slow fever in her brain, ever au-ziously looking forward to its germinating into She fell asleep, repeating to herself, as if she were already receiving guests, and introducing
